Culture Shock

Culture is made up of the common things that members of a community learn and share, and it influences how we look, how we act and how we communicate. When you go to a new country, you enter a new culture that is often very different from your own. What might be perfectly normal in one place may be unusual in the other. And these differences can be challenging. Culture shock can be described as the feelings, sometimes confusing and frustrating, that a person may experience when living in a new and different culture. There are times when these feelings can be overwhelming and cause sadness and anxiety. In fact, you just want to go back home! The good news is that culture shock is temporary. According to a number of sources, culture shock has four stages:

1. The Honeymoon Stage. Everything is exciting. You enjoy the differences between the new culture and your home culture. You want to learn everything about this new place.
2. The Honeymoon is Over Stage. You start noticing differences, and not always positive ones. You don't like people's attitudes, and you start missing your old familiar things, such as food, TV programs, family or friends' gatherings. You may feel anxious or angry at this stage.
3. The Gradual Adjustment Stage. You start becoming more familiar with your new home. Things are becoming easier to understand. You feel more comfortable and your sense of humor returns.
4. The Feeling at Home Stage. Negative feelings almost vanish at this stage. You don't have to be in love with the new country, but now you feel like the new culture is another home.
